

Gun Violence Prevention Challenge Summit & Hack-a-thon

April 13 – 15, 2018 | Boston, Massachusetts

Louis Klarevas is Associate Lecturer of Global Affairs at the University of Massachusetts, Boston, and the author of Rampage Nation: Securing America from Mass Shootings (2016). During his 20-year career as an academic, he has been on the faculties of George Washington University, City University of New York, and New York University. At the latter, he founded and coordinated the graduate program in Transnational Security. He has also held the positions of Defense Analysis Research Fellow at the London School of Economics and Political Science and as United States Senior Fulbright Scholar in Security Studies at the University of Macedonia. His current research examines the nexus between American public safety and large-scale gun violence. In this capacity, he has assisted the states of California and Colorado, as an expert witness, as they defended against constitutional challenges to their firearms regulation laws. Recently, he part of a team of scholars, coordinated through Johns Hopkins University, tasked with reviewing the implications of allowing guns on college campuses. He also occasionally serves as a consultant to the federal government on security and counter-terrorism issues. A political scientist by training, he holds a B.A. from the University of Pennsylvania and a Ph.D. from American University.
